The Tropic Bird's Flight.

The tropic bird with plumes so white
Towards her path flies
A refugee. Soon mournful night
Will drape the pearly skies.
How high she soars so far above,
Some cannot hear her song,
It only reaches those who love
Her; as she sweeps along.

At Kawaiahao.

It was a strikingly solemn procession which passed along King street after midnight, when the remains of the late Princess Kaiulani were brought from Aiea to the old church, where her ancestors were taught Christianity and first heard about the Saviour.
The sad procession moved slowly toward town. Her father and her girl friends followed the hearse on foot and at 1:30 a. m. the casket containing the remains of the young chiefess was placed on the catafalque in the beautifully decorated church.
Here a large number of friends had gathered, and during the night a vigil was kept by the faithful men and women who bury the hope of Hawaii, when to-morrow Kaiulani is placed in the dim chamber of the Royal Mausoleum.
During the day a large number of people have visited the church and taken the last view of the lovely features of the young girl. Stately kahilis surround the bier, and the church is artistically decorated by loving hands.
To-morrow afternoon the funeral will take place. During the service at the church Mrs. Geo. W. Macfarlane will sing a solo with the choir. The hymn selected will be "Angels Ever Bright and Fair." Then the sad walk to the last resting place of the young princess will begin, and when the sun sets to-morrow evening Kaiulani will have disappeared from the midst of Hawaii, gone but never forgotten.

French Detectives Shadow Royalists Special cable to The Call and the New York Herald.

BRUSSELS, Feb. 26.—The Duc d'Orleans, who came to Brussels six days ago to watch events at Paris, last evening took the train to Turin, confessing that he had no chance against the republic. He allowed an interview, in which he asserted that M. Deroulede had not acted on the Royalist account, but on the contrary had blundered terribly and destroyed Royalist chances.

During the whole of the Duke's stay in Brussels, where he led a quiet, uneventful life, he has been watched and followed, step by step, by French detectives, some in disguise, some riding bicycles and some on foot. One succeeded in passing himself off as a Parisian monarchical journalist and interviewed the Duke, who confided his hopes to him.

Prince Victor Napoleon is considered here a much more serious pretender because less impatient, more dignified and absolutely silent. He also is watched by French detectives. They learned that he often drives an automobile and sometimes even ventures a few miles into French territory. So they got an automobile from Paris to follow him in case of need.

One notable feature of the stay of the Duc d'Orleans is that although he went to the royal palace of the Count of Flanders he was neither received by the King nor the King's brother. He only received a visit from the Duke of Vendome. It is believed that the King discreetly advised him through the latter to prolong his stay in Belgium as little as possible.

TURIN, Feb. 26.—The Duc d'Orleans arrived here this evening from Brussels.
